Fiat-Chrysler, a recipient of auto industry bailout funding, recently imposed drastic rate cuts on the auto transport companies that have been safely and reliably delivering their new cars and truck to dealerships for years. Fiat-Chrysler has also turned a large portion of its auto transport requirements to independent contractors. Fiat-Chrysler's new auto transport policy of shifting to independent contractors and bleeding its long-time auto transport companies dry is a business model that hurts taxpayers, consumers and workers, and potentially undermines road and worker safety standards. Professional carhaul drivers have been making significant sacrifices even before the auto industry asked for bailout relief, and they continue to do so, including taking wage cuts of upwards of 17.5%.

The public needs to tell auto manufacturers like Fiat Chrysler to respect the American taxpaying public that bailed it out and to respect American workers.
